Q: How to change JavaScript value in combination with Date value I want to change the JavaScript value in combination with Date. And I don't know how to change the JavaScript in combination with Date. I'm trying to put together a quiz. After the user has successfully answered some questions they will be presented with a like button. If they press the like button I have a Javascript function that will change the value of that button to a 'liked' button. But I also need that if they don't like the posts I have some code that will remove the like button. I can only think of using ajax in the PHP code, but I can't think of any other way. Can someone please help me and help me change this javascript code? Here is the Javascript I use to change the button: //Function that changes button to a liked button function like_post(post_id) { $.post('/', {id: post_id, 'token': token}, function(data) { $('#answer_' + post_id).html(data); }, "json"); } A: You don't need jQuery, just plain Javascript: function like_post(post_id) { if (data == 'liked') { // do nothing } else { document.getElementById('answer_' + post_id).innerHTML = 'liked'; } } Q: Is there a security risk in storing user-submitted data on the server? I'm trying to find a simple answer to this question, and while I'm sure there is none, I'm not sure the right phrases to search for the answer. I'm building a web application that allows users to upload images through a jquery plugin. The plugin communicates with a php script that saves the images to the server (in a folder called "images", which is physically in my code). Is there any security risk with saving images on the server? The images are text files and I wouldn't be surprised if there could be a way to access them, but in that case I would want

I. Field of the Invention The present invention relates generally to the field of heat exchangers. More particularly, the present invention relates to a heat exchanger system which utilizes gaseous nitrogen to heat water in a residential water tank. II. Description of Related Art It is desirable to provide heating systems for warm water in certain parts of the country. It is also desirable to provide such systems using a gaseous medium, rather than a combustible liquid or gas. A number of heating systems have been devised to utilize gaseous nitrogen to heat water. However, many of the known heating systems have certain disadvantages which limit their popularity. One known prior art system is described in U.S. Pat. No. 3,714,436, issued to Nalder on Feb. 6, 1973. The Nalder patent describes a heating system which uses a hot pressurized gas, such as nitrogen, to heat water passing through a heating chamber. The chamber is heated by causing a portion of the pressurized gas to pass through the chamber and is said to preheat the chamber prior to allowing water to pass therethrough. However, the Nalder system has several disadvantages. Water is forced into the heating chamber via a water line which is connected to the pressurized gas. Accordingly, the pressurized gas must be at a relatively high temperature in order to heat the water quickly to a desired temperature. The system must also be closed off in order to allow the pressurized gas to completely and properly heat the heating chamber. This is a disadvantage because open systems are more efficient in heating the water, and they are less susceptible to having the pressurized gas pass therethrough so that the heating chamber cannot be preheated. Because the Nalder system uses a pressurized gas, special equipment is needed to pressurize the nitrogen. In the event the pressurized gas should escape, this would damage the environment. The subject invention addresses the above problems, and provides a novel gaseous nitrogen-based heating system for a residential water tank. Human umbilical cord blood-derived mesenchymal stem cells attenuate oxygen-glucose deprivation/reoxygenation-induced neurological deficits in rats. Human umbilical cord blood-derived mesenchymal stem cells (hUCB-MSCs) have recently emerged as a viable source of cells for cell-based therapeutic interventions and were thus selected for the present study. In the study, hUCB-MSCs were
